NIXON IN HELL

Hell was nothing like Richard Nixon thought it would be, not that he had thought much about it when he was Upside. That was the term everyone here used to describe the world in which they had once lived. It was an ironic reference to the ancient and erroneous belief that Hell was subterranean. As far as anyone could figure out, it wasn’t anywhere in relation to earth. But in every other way it was undeniably the Adownside, so the term stuck.

On the few occasions that Nixon had thought about Hell X usually during interminable church services that presidents feel compelled to attend X he imagined fire and brimstone and little red devils with spears and evil grins, swishing their tails in delight when they made tortured souls writhe in agony. Hell may once have been like that X opinion among Alifers was divided X but over the centuries it had evolved to reflect lessons the devil and his assistants had learned from observing life on earth. Not that they lacked imagination, but when it came to torture, human beings showed an ingenuity and dedication that the devil found inspiring. So Hell was frequently remodeled to take advantage of the latest in human innovation. Some time back, the devil had installed an ornate, wrought iron gate with the words Arbeit macht frei [work makes you free] across the top. Scuttlebutt had it that his assistants were now upgrading modules to incorporate the latest in computer graphics technology. Virtual torture would free more assistants for administrative tasks, always a crushing burden in eras of extraordinary growth.

Nixon entered Hell through the devil’s gate, and being a well-read man, understood its significance all too well. Inside, he caught sight of a devil -- he looked like everyone else but his tail gave him away. He was dressed in a smartly tailored S.S. uniform and barking out orders to kapos -- prisoners who worked for the camp authorities in return for special privileges. They used their bull whips to separate terrified newcomers into two groups and herd them off in different directions. Nixon and about twenty other souls, were marched off through the mud to one of the hundreds of squat, wooden barracks that formed a grid on the seemingly endless plain. The sky was gray and the fast moving, low clouds gave the camp something of a two dimensional quality. Dressed in a tropical weight suit Nixon began to shiver.

The barracks smelled something fierce, but they were at least warm. They were largely deserted; Nixon wondered if their prior occupants had been gassed. The S.S. guard escorting them shouted something in German that Nixon did not understand. An old man, lying on one of the bottom bunks, looked up and explained in heavily accented English that Nixon was expected to undress and change into one of the blue and white striped uniforms stacked in two neat piles in a corner of the barracks. Nixon looked around and saw a few of his group beginning to shed their clothes. He had always been uncomfortable about undressing in front of other people, and in his student days had usually managed to find some ruse to avoid changing in locker rooms. The whip exploded in the air in front of Nixon’s face and he involuntarily jumped back in fright. The guard shouted at him, and Nixon took off his jacket and fumbled with his tie.

The two piece uniform was stiff and uncomfortable, but had been freshly laundered. The pants were too tight, and the jacket was at least two sizes too large.
The contrast with his argyle socks and soft leather, Italian shoes was striking. The old man told him that the bunk above his was unoccupied, and that he should take it. To Nixon, all the bunks looked unoccupied, but then he realized that nobody came here with luggage or personal effects. He wondered how he would brush his teeth; he looked around and noticed there was no sink.

AWhere do I wash up?, he asked.

The old man smiled. AYou don’t.,

AWhat did I do to deserve this? I’m not a Jew! Why have they sent me here? There must have been a mistake. . . unless one of those [expletive deleted] reporters was responsible for this.,

ARelax, the old man said. ANobody here is Jewish or Gypsy. Beelzebub is sadistic but not insensitive.

AOr else he has a wicked sense of humor, volunteered another man.

Nixon turned to address him. AWhat do you mean?,

AThink about it, he said. ANo Jews or Romany, but a permanent work force of former guards or petty officials at Nazi concentration camps, or people somehow connected with Hitler’s campaigns of extermination. They are treated like shit, and there’s no hope of liberation. He shook his head. AEndless cycles of hard labor and beatings. Freezing in the winter, roasting in the summer.,

AI’d slit my throat, Nixon volunteered.

AYou can’t, the second man said. That’s the beauty of it. Nobody dies here, because you’re already dead! There’s no way out unless they ship you off Nixon’s voice grew animated. “You mean some people leave here alive?”

“Alive? Let’s not get into that one. But yes, people, most of them, leave. The place looks like Auschwitz-Birkenau, but it is a processing center, not a death camp. Most new arrivals stay here no longer than a week or two. They get shipped out in cattle cars to other locations for resettlement.”

Nixon gave him a quizzical look. “So it’s Auschwitz in reverse?”

“More or less. It’s a devilishly clever scheme, don’t you agree?”

The conversation was interrupted by the return of the other inhabitants of the barracks. They passed through the door one at a time, trudged across its floor of bare wooden planking and sought out their bunks in silence. Nixon looked at them in horror.

“It’s O.K.,” said the old man reading his thoughts. They’re not Nazis, just ordinary sinners like you and me.

“Ordinary sinners, you say?”

“Run-of-the-mill mass murderers.”

“Murderers? I’m not a murderer!”

The door opened again and a detail of kapos pushed through a wheelbarrow that contained two large, covered, metal cauldrons. Inmates rose from their bunks, grabbed their tin bowls and quickly lined up to be served a thin gruel and chunks of stale, pale gray-colored bread. Nixon was hungry but revolted by the smell of the gruel and could not bring himself to go through the chow line. He stood in front of his bunk thinking about suppers on his terrace overlooking the Pacific. “What I wouldn’t give for a bowl somewhere.”
of cottage cheese and ketchup!, he said to himself.

The old man consumed his gruel with enthusiasm and used a piece of bread to soak up whatever liquid was left in the bottom of his bowl. Nixon watched him in amazement. Just like an animal, he thought. The old man popped the last piece of bread into his mouth and replaced his empty bowl on a nail sticking out from the side of his bunk. Nixon waited from him to get into his bunk before resuming their conversation.

A You said this is a camp for mass murderers?!

A That=s right. Everyone here is guilty of it in some way, directly or indirectly. I could have saved Jews during the Holocaust. The man who spoke to you earlier helped to plan the fire bombing of Tokyo. Jean-Claude over there wiped out villages during the Algerian war of independence. Hami killed French settlers. The old man pointed to the bunk above Jean-Claude. They=re inseparable buddies.

A I didn=t kill anybody!\n
A Nobody wants to think of himself as a murderer.\n
A A kapo arrived with a footstool and positioned it under one of four naked bulbs that provided illumination to the windowless barracks. He had to unscrew each bulb from its socket; they were very hot and he could only give them a quick twist before removing his hand. It took five or six tries before the first bulb flickered and went out. The kapo blew on his fingers to ease the pain before moving the stool into position under the next bulb. When the barracks was dark, the kapo left, and Nixon heard the sound of a padlock being attached to the door.
They lock us in for the night? he asked the old man.

Yes, not that there’s anywhere to go.

What if I have to go to the bathroom? I have a weak bladder.

You’d better learn to control it.

There’s no John in the barracks?

I think you should go to bed, the old man said.

Nixon gingerly raised his foot and put it on the wooden frame of the old man’s bunk to get a better purchase on his own bunk. He grabbed the side board above and tried twice without success to pull himself up. He waited to catch his breath before trying again.

The old man suggested that he grab one end of the frame and hook his leg over the other end. Then you should be able to pull yourself up and roll over on to the mattress.

Maybe I’ll just sleep on the floor.

Go ahead. . . if you don’t mind the rats.

Nixon thought about this for a minute, and decided to give it one more try. He followed the old man’s instructions and after some effort made it into the bunk. He eased his tired body on to the lumpy, straw-filled mattress. There was no pillow.

The days that followed were miserable. Nixon was infested with lice and fleas, and scratching his bites only made them itch more. He ate nothing for two days and tried to ignore his hunger pangs. On the third day, cramps and severe stomach pains forced him into the chow line. He had been assigned to a work team that dug holes for the foundations of new barracks. It was back-breaking work, especially for somebody who was out of shape and suffered from flebitis. After his first fifteen minutes of digging, he thought he was going to faint. He let his shovel drop and tried to steady himself while gasping for air. One of the kapos in charge of the work detail, a round-faced Asian, shouted at him in a language Nixon thought might be Chinese. He understood that he was supposed to resume work, but he was unable to move. The kapo addressed him again and then lashed out with his coiled whip. Nixon felt its leather tip draw across his buttocks and was then overcome by an intense burning sensation. Somehow, his body found the energy to bend down to pick up the shovel.

Nixon struggled to come to terms with his situation. At first he hoped it was just a particularly vivid nightmare. He gave that idea up after being abruptly awakened from a real dream the next morning by a kapo marching through the barracks shaking a cowbell. He was mustered out of his bunk and the barracks and marched to the common latrine and showers. No dream, he decided, could have a smell so ugly and penetrating.

Nixon’s next response was anger. The devil had no right to punish him this way. He was not a mass murderer; character assassination was his biggest sin. If he was here, where were Kennedy and Johnson? Those two were real criminals, he reassured himself. Kennedy had stolen the White House from him in 1960 by having the Daley machine stuff all those ballot boxes in Cook County. He was a fool for persuading his supporters that it was not in the national interest to challenge the election in the courts. And that egomaniac Johnson dragged the country into a useless war in Vietnam. It took him and Henry four years to get out with honor, and we would have done it sooner too if it those [expletive deleted] Democrats hadn’t stirred up the hippies and tried to block their every move in Congress. Nixon began to think that Kennedy had bested him again. He had carefully cultivated his relationship with Billy Graham, but the Kennedy clan had all those cardinals eating out of their hands, even the Vatican, for all he knew. Maybe they got the pope to pull strings to send him here? Just the kind of thing they would do!

Nixon was also unhappy about the way he was being treated in Hell. Maybe he was a sinner, although assuredly not a murderer, but he was also a VIP. Nobody had met him at the gate, not that he expected old Lucifer himself. But the devil could have sent a couple of his assistants. Brezhnev must be here X Mao too. The thought was strangely comforting. He would have to ask them what kind of reception they had received. He wondered how they were holding up; he had difficulty imagining either or them digging ditches. For the first time since he had entered Hell, Nixon broke into a grin.

The old man with the Italian accent aside, nobody had briefed him about Hell. That would have been one of the perks of VIP treatment. He allowed himself to remember how attentive, well-dressed assistants and officers in crew cuts and perfectly pressed uniforms had fawned over him, anxiously soliciting his approval for memos, schedules and itineraries, even what to serve at state dinners. In Hell he was anonymous and powerless. Nobody deferred to him or told him anything, unless it was an order, and then it was usually barked in German or Chinese. Once Nixon had screwed up his courage to talk back. He had demanded that the kapo marching his group off to a work site take him to see whoever was in charge. The kapo told him to shut up X or so Nixon assumed from his tone of voice X but he continued to insist that he speak to someone in authority. The kapo shrugged his shoulders and summoned a colleague to take over the work detail. He led Nixon off in a different direction to a small hut at some distance from any of the barracks. Nixon rehearsed the speech he would make, but he never got the chance. Two kapos appeared from nowhere with and began to beat him with rubber hoses. Nixon remembered absorbing a number of painful blows before losing consciousness.

After his beating, Nixon withdrew from camp life as much as possible and sought refuge in memories of pleasant upside moments. He went through the motions of morning ablution, work, meals, free time until he found release in sleep. His social interactions were limited to perfunctory conversations with the old man. Inner exile helped Nixon to preserve his dignity, and he almost convinced himself that reality was his mental reveries, not servitude in a concentration camp. Every afternoon when his work detailed finished, Nixon always managed to lead the procession back to the barracks. He would walk smartly up the steps and nod his head ever so slightly in acknowledgment to an imaginary band leader who struck up Hail to the Chief as soon as the president came into view.

Nixon’s coping strategy was ultimately defeated by curiosity. He had an alert and inquiring mind that could only be suppressed for so long. It surreptitiously stored and processed information from his new environment, awaiting a propitious moment to intrude on his inner self. Nixon was vaguely aware that part of his mind was insubordinate and impossible to fully control. He gave this corner of his mind the nickname \( \text{Henry} \), and chose to tolerate it as long as it did not interfere with his fantasy life. This uneasy accommodation lasted for some time; Nixon really did not know for how long, nor did he care. Time’s arrow was a tool used by the mind to order memories and expectations to cope with the world that Nixon had rejected.

He was brought back to reality by recognition of a familiar face. He had been digging an irrigation trench alongside a newly constructed barracks when another work detail passed by struggling to push wheelbarrows laden with bags of cement across the damp and uneven ground. The high-pitched scraping sounds of the wheels was as penetrating as it was unpleasant and Nixon involuntarily looked up to identify the source of the annoyance. His subconscious mind registered the scene and the face of the kapo hurrying the work detail along and filed it away for subsequent analysis. Later that afternoon Nixon was resting in his bunk having just finished a long replay of the banquet Mao Tse-tung had held in his honor in the Great Hall of the People. He had not enjoyed the food -- too much spice and too many vegetables -- but he reveled in being the center of attention, not only of Mao, but of the entire world. He was especially pleased that Mao had directed most of his questions about America to him rather than to Henry, and that this had been picked up by the press.

Nixon’s mind went blank while his memory banks uploaded scenes from his favorite film, Around the World in Eighty Days. His subconscious chose this moment to intervene, and signaled Nixon that it had sighted someone he knew. Nixon summoned up the image of the work detail in preference to the movie. The kapo’s face was indeed familiar, but he could not put a name to it. He had never been good at recalling names, and it was always more difficult to do so when he encountered people out of context. Nixon wondered if anyone would recognize him. He had grown leaner, and as far as he could tell there was no mirror in the barracks he had lost most of his double chin. For some reason, neither his hair nor nails had grown, and he pulled his fingers across his cheek to confirm that his skin was smooth and lacking his tell-tale afternoon stubble. For the next hour or so he played over the scene in his mind’s eye. The long, angular face with deep-set eyes was definitely somebody he knew from his political past, when they were both much younger, he thought. It bothered him that he could not identify the man, and decided to do what he could to arrange another encounter.

To do this, Nixon had to take a more active interest in camp life and began to engage the old man in more animated discussion.

A I was worried about you, the old man confided.

A About me?, Nixon asked.

A Yes. A lot of people never come out of withdrawal. They don’t want to face the truth.

A What truth?

A You need to find the answer to that yourself, my son.

Nixon began to wonder if he was the only sane person in the barracks. He absent-mindedly plucked a louse from beneath his shirt and calmly crushed it between his fingers.  How long have you been here old man?

Not very long. Twenty or thirty years. I don’t rightly know.

You don’t know?

No. It’s not important.

Nixon pondered his answer and decided not to pursue the line of questioning any further in the expectation that he would find any clarification even more depressing. Instead, he guided the conversation toward the camp and the work detail he had witnessed that morning. He learned that it contained upwards of 50,000 souls, who provided the labor force used to maintain and expand the camp. Ever since he had arrived, the old man explained, expansion had been underway, and there were rumors that this was only one of many concentration camps.

Nixon still hoped he might be one of the fortunate people in transit. Where would they send him? He remembered a newspaper column by that bastard Buchwald that proposed he be sentenced to an eternity in high school as punishment for Watergate. That would be just fine, he thought. There would be no back-breaking labor in high school, but recesses and hot school lunches. He salivated at the thought of the latter. Were there still hot lunches, or was it one of the programs his administration had cut? Nixon felt an unusual pang of guilt.

The old man interrupted Nixon’s reverie. If you were in transit, you would have been out of here already. You’re one of us.

What do you mean, one of us?

I told you when you first arrived. Everyone here is guilty in some way of mass murder.

ANow let me say this about that. . .

The old man raised his hand with an air of practiced authority and Nixon stopped in mid-sentence.

AAs far as I can tell, the old man explained in a detached voice, Awe have been divided into three groups. The largest number of people are those who abetted mass murder indirectly. They are people like Lou, who knew at the time it was wrong to calculate the distribution of incendiaries most likely to create a massive firestorm over Tokyo. Or, Hwang-ho, who, for a small bribe, told the Chinese authorities were anti-communist refugees were hiding. They were all slaughtered. There= s even the odd spy who sold or gave away secrets that led to peoples= deaths. They work as laborers or do chores around the camp, like serving food and doing laundry.

ALaundry, Nixon said. A= ve been in these clothes since I arrived. They= re absolutely filthy!

APiano, piano, the old man said, using his mother tongue with Nixon for the first time. AEverything here takes time, and you have lots of it before you.

At a loss for words, Nixon looked down at his feet. His favorite shoes were all but unrecognizable. If only he had known, he would have been buried in Gorex hiking boots. The Egyptians had the right idea, he thought. They buried their dead with everything they were expected to need in the afterlife, although sandals would not last long here. He wondered why he had seen no Egyptians; everybody here was modern, although they came from every corner of the globe. In due course, he would have to ask the old man.

A Some people ultimately leave; where they go I don’t know. The old man made the sign of the cross. A The second group consists of people who actually committed atrocities. They do hard labor; I explained that to you earlier. The third group are the most serious offenders. They ordered or planned mass murder, or, like me, were in a position to stop it at little risk to themselves and failed to do so. They spend some time as kapos, and are compelled to beat and torture other inmates.

A What sort of punishment is that?, Nixon asked.

A Think about it, the old man suggested. A For the most part these are people who see themselves, or used to anyway, as decent, even god fearing folk. Many of them were caring parents, respectful of their neighbors and invariably kind to their pets. Did you ever notice that people are on the whole kinder to animals than they are to each other? Even when we slaughter animals for food, we try to do it as quickly and painlessly as possible.

A There are animal activists who would disagree, Nixon suggested.

A I know. There are people here who killed people to protect animals. Also people who killed to prevent abortion.

A You were telling me about punishment, Nixon reminded the old man.

A You’re right, I digress. But there’s really no reason to hurry. Some mass murderers are Sadists. But many of the people responsible for mass murder are not, and pride themselves on having led exemplary lives. The violence they committed was never first-hand, so it was easy for them to deny responsibility. To the extent they thought about it, they convinced themselves they were merely cogs in the wheel or, if they were near to the apex of authority, that their behavior was compelled by reasons of state.

Alt often is.

The old man ignored Nixon=s comment. AHere in Hell, they get the opportunity to experience violence first-hand.

All know. I=ve been beaten.

ANo, you still don=t understand. You get to beat people.

AWhat do you mean?, Nixon asked.

AIn due course, they=ll teach you to beat and torture people without doing too much damage to their internal organs. Just like medical school, you practice on dummies before you do it to real people.

AYou=re kidding!

AAl never joke, the old man said. Al wish I could. I think I would have had a happier life.

AAl= not known for my sense of humor either.

The old man lowered his voice, not that anybody was listening. AYou get to beat other inmates, usually with truncheons or rubber hoses, but sometimes with your bare fists.

AAl couldn=t do that.

AOh yes, you can, the old man insisted. AYou will not only pummel people but burn them with cigarettes and shock them with cattle prods and metal clamps you attach to their nipples and testicles.

Al=ll refuse!

The old man shook his head and regarded Nixon with a look of pity. Al=ll won=t work. I said no at first. They frog-marched me to the outskirts of the camp and forced me into a hole just wide enough to accommodate me standing up. They kept me there for two days, without food or water, while water seeped in up to the level of my knees. I was still recalcitrant, so they thrashed me. I held out until they explained how they were going to force a glass catheter up my urethra and then manhandle my penis so that the catheter splintered into numerous fragments. They said the pain would be excruciating for years to come whenever I urinated.

Nixon shuddered and tried to push from his mind the image of a glass tube being rammed up his penis. He wouldn=t even wish such a fate on the owners and staff of the Washington Post.

The old man shook his head. Al even lack the courage to be a martyr. So I agreed to do what they wanted. At first it wasn=t too awful. I worked over some newcomers with hoses. I tried not to hit them too hard, but the kapos saw that I was holding back and threatened me with the catheter unless I lashed out with all my strength. It was awful. I beat the victims into unconsciousness.

Al know what that feels like, Nixon said.

ABelieve me, it=s pretty terrible on the giving end too. I through they would let me go after a few beatings, but it only got worse. Each time I was pushed into doing something worse. They made me do unspeakable things. The old man crossed himself again.

A How long did this go on?

AI don’t know. In the end, they had me garrotte a young man until his face turned blue and he collapsed. They told me I had killed him.

Nixon frowned. A I thought you said nobody died here?

The old man shrugged his shoulders. A Every night I see his contorted face with his tongue sticking out and hear the gurgling sound he made as he struggled unsuccessfully to draw in air. Now I know what it means to be a murderer.

Hard labor, simple food and the absence of coffee and alcohol had worked wonders for Nixon’s body. He had lost weight and his blood circulation had improved. He had also become increasingly inured to the fleas and lice that colonized his mattress and hair, and rarely bothered to scratch his bites. That night, Nixon lay awake in his bunk -- into which he now easily climbed -- thinking about what the old man had told him. He did not want to torture anybody, and he certainly did not want it done to him.

The next morning Nixon gave a perfunctory hello to the old man, and was relieved to throw himself into the numbing mindlessness of hard, physical labor. The work went quickly and Nixon was not the least perturbed by the rain that splattered him during a brief late morning shower. He wondered if the devil was able to control the weather. The winter season was perennially gray with only rare glimpses of the sun. It rained or snowed almost every day; never enough to make work impossible, but enough to keep the ground wet and muddy and make work difficult. Nixon kept a sharp lookout for the kapo he had seen the day before. He was absolutely certain it was somebody he knew.

When Nixon returned to the barracks he found the old man lying in his bunk and anxious to resume their conversation. He decided to do his best to keep it away from the topic of the previous evening. The old man must have sensed his anxiety, and to Nixon’s relief, talked about his adjustment to the routine of Hell.

Almost of the men here miss women, he told Nixon, but I’ve never been troubled by their absence in the camp. I was a priest and celibate even when I was young.

I don’t miss women either. But I do miss my wife. She did a good job of looking after me and never judged me. I’m glad she’s not here. I wouldn’t want her to see me now.

What do you miss?

Music. Music and books. I played the piano. I wasn’t great, but I played well enough to enjoy it, show tunes and the like. Life X or whatever this is X is going to be Hell without music.

Nietzsche said there is no life without music. The old man reached up with his right hand to scratch his bald pate. Little did he know.

I had no idea Nietzsche said anything like that. I always thought of him as one of those nihilists.

Well, there is that side of him, the old man conceded.

Damn . . . . A Nixon stopped himself. I probably shouldn’t say that here.
The old man chuckled. “I don’t think it can do you any harm.”

“What I meant to say, is that I may have an eternity in front of me without music and books. I might enjoy reading Nietzsche, and certainly all the history and literature I never had time for upside. I’d give anything for a good book... especially if it were printed in large type.”

“Don’t be so sure,” the old man said. He turned his back on Nixon and reached around and behind his mattress to pull out a bible. Nixon could tell immediately what it was from the gold cross embossed on the black, pseudo-leather cover.

The old man held it out to Nixon to inspect. “They gave me this a couple of days before they took me off for torture training.”

Nixon took the bible and stared at it for several seconds. He wiped one hand and then the other on the cleanest part of his pants before fingering its pages. It would not have been his first choice of books, but he was overjoyed to see any book a sign of the life he once knew. Tears welled up in his eyes.

“May I read it?”

“Of course. How could a priest refuse anyone a bible? Just be furtive about it. I don’t know how the kapos would respond if they caught you with it. You’d better stash it under your mattress.”

“What about you? Don’t you want to read it?”

“No, not really. It’s another one of the devil’s little jokes.”

“I don’t understand.”

The old man swallowed hard and scrunched up his leathery face. “Al was a priest. I rose to a position of high authority in the church during difficult times. Secularism and materialism were luring people away from the faith, and much of Europe fell into the hands of two Godless regimes that had declared war on Christianity. Italy was occupied by the Germans in September 1943, and the Bolsheviks were advancing daily in the East. The Church had no choice but to reach some accommodation with the Germans, and I also thought them the lesser of the two evils.

Statesmanship requires compromise, Nixon said.

I went too far. In looking after the interests of the Church I lost sight of the principles on which it was based. The old man paused, and Nixon stood silently shifting his weight from foot to foot waiting to see if he would continue.

The old man braced himself against the bunk frame and resumed his story.

Not long after the Germans occupied Rome the order came from Berlin to round up and deport the city’s Jews. Many of them sought refuge in the Vatican, and I only allowed in those who had converted to Christianity, had a Christian parent or were somehow well-connected or otherwise useful. In October the S.S. put 1,007 Jews on a train destined for here, for Auschwitz-Birkenau. Two of my associates pleaded with me to join them and stand in front of the train in our robes and miters in protest. They insisted that the Nazis would never dare move the train in our presence, and that our action would galvanize opposition to them all over Italy. I said no, and forbade them to take any action by themselves. I made only the weakest protest to the German ambassador. I later learned that the S.S. had orders to back off from any deportations if the Vatican expressed any serious opposition. All the people on the train died, and some of them were only children. The old man crossed himself.

A You can see why I don’t want to look at the bible, let alone read it. All it does it remind me of my moral failings. Perhaps one day when I have come to terms with my guilt I will be able to take solace in the good book again.

Nixon realized that he was still holding the bible, and not wanting to give his friend any offence, reached over to stash it under his mattress. He noticed several bed bugs jump when he lifted up the corner of the mattress. He turned back to face the old man but was at a loss for words.

His embarrassment was only momentary, because the door of the barracks opened and he and the old looked across to see a kapo enter. As the kapo walked under one of the light bulbs and Nixon got a good look at his face. A chill ran down his spine and beads of sweat instantly appeared on his hands and forehead. It was the kapo he had seen yesterday, and now Nixon knew who it was. The kapo approached his bunk, smiled and handed him a book. Without thinking, Nixon reached out to accept it. By the time he had second thoughts and tried to withdraw his arm, it drew back with the book clasped in his hand. Alger Hiss turned on his heels and strode out of the barracks. Nixon stood motionless and watched him depart. After the door banged shut, he looked down at the book. It was a cloth edition of William Shawcross, _Sideshow: Kissinger, Nixon and the Destruction of Cambodia_. Its dog-eared, red dust jacket had a picture of a B-52 disgorging packets of cluster bombs.

c. Richard Ned Lebow, May 1999
